The renovation of a 1948 ranch home strikes an ideal balance between architecture and landscape. In this project, a cluttered property is simplified and unified, allowing soaring trees to dominate the site and complement the new minimalist structures. Harmonious proportions and simple elements combine for an elegant solution. The design connects paths, terraces, pool and lawn to the mature tree groves, creating an integrated surround to the contemporary residence. The landscape architect sited a new pavilion, renovated the original elliptical pool, re-used historic trees, reduced impervious surfaces and incorporated on-site storm water infiltration. The restrained materials palette includes warm grey limestone paving, which extends from the main rooms to outdoor terraces, merging the interior and exterior environments. The home's glass walls now frame textured green vistas, and the horizontality of the architecture counterpoints the towering redwoods, cedars and Valley Oaks.
